space that configure out-of-the-way and off the grid, and the functioning of a network of stakeholders within this distribution, shaping the use of geography and video. Taking a long-term and collaborative basis, they have created a form of movement and cooperation in both spheres of the Mediterranean Sea. On the one hand, we aim to reflect on different models of mobility, systems of sharing and migration, and on the other hand, we want to challenge the idea of urban mobility in the Maghreb, by examining the 19th-century Orientalism and its commodification in the contemporary Islamic world. Taking this into consideration, the meaning of images and the politics of vision that they provide, their works need to mark lost hidden meanings and to question perceptions that conflict with past colonial visions and present situations.

Currently, they are staying at the Bilbao Sheila in Paris, working on a project that brings together the present time and the transition period of post-AWIL. They investigate the representation of a changing space as depicted in Italian cinema, opening up a discussion on history through the history of architecture and cinema. Since 2020, their work has been shown in international exhibitions and lectures, including the Maghreb Conference.

Towards an agonistic conception of Europe

Chantal Mouffe

This lecture by Chantal Mouffe will examine the relationship of her agonistic approach for enacting the future of the democracy in the European Union. Against the backdrop of the current and future processes of European integration, she argues in favour of a European Union envisioned as a site where conflict and resistance can be negotiated and thereby, breaking the multiplicity and diversity of collective identities in its midst, as well as their effective dimension.

An open society needs borders

Paul Schiffer

For a minute, we actually thought that history was over after the fall of the Berlin Wall and the dissolution of Communism. Liberal democracy would end up as the international idea. Freedom would mean republicanism and indeed, that relationship after tribalism turned and fell. Meanwhile, fast to face with every time, the latter better. And with the return of history, geography, too, has become the most relevant again: Like the French...

Re-thinking the spatial realities of Europe

Markus Mieszen

This approach is a long-term research project led by Markus Mieszen and focuses on the relationship between mobility and European identity. The project aims to explore how mobility has shaped European identity and how it has been affected by the European Union. The research draws on a wide range of sources, including historical documents, interviews, and secondary literature.
